YOUNG LINGUISTS

Chris O'Hara

I used to know a girl, (her locker was next to mine), who proclaimed daily to her spray-tanned, fake blonde friend,
 "ohmygod I'm like literally gonna kill myself."

And her friend would always respond with an apathetic
 "that's hilarious."

One day, as they had their suicide talk, I asked:
 "well how come you never do?"

She informed me that a recent conference of adolescent linguists had decided to change the English language to be less descript, less difficult.

The conference had decided that literally now means "probably not gonna happen"
and hilarious now means "this could, in some contexts be misconstrued as something vaguely humorous."

and starving no longer refers to African babies, gaunt, hollow eyed, with distended bellies.
Real starvation is "I haven't eaten in twenty minutes."

and freedom, the way politicians use it, is no longer Thoreau out in the woods, rather, a prisoner behind concrete walls and iron bars who now has the freedom to use the prison library whenever he wants.

And my locker neighbor, Megan, never once surprised me, by not being there in the morning.
